Letter From the Lab

Sometimes language feels like it arrives late and insufficient. That the work of words (words as work) and the rhythm of insitutional life is out of pace with the brutalities we're writing and labouring in the midst of. It brings to mind a line from poet Zaina Alsous, who considers language "a placeholder for what the land already knows." In conversation with academia, and with life, how to move beyond words through our attention, presence, and connection to our surroundings?

The upcoming month is pretty active at the lab. (dis)connect club continues, we're organising a film screening, hosting our first Feminist Technoscience in Practice event of the year, plus an encoding/ embroidery workshop which Lab Technician Luis has been artfully scheming these past weeks. Each one feels somehow connected to overarching questions of care, interdependence, safekeeping, and ritual. We hope you'll join us, whether for an event or just to spend some time together in the lab.

Also, a couple of PSAs: one, stickers have arrived! You're welcome to pick them up at the lab. And two, our new open hours are on Fridays from 1-4pm! Drop by to chat, learn about ETHOS or just be in the space. In the meantime, wishing you all a good and gentle Easter Break! ✨ ♪ ✨ ♪

Book of the month is 'Against Technoableism' by Ashley Shew, who writes "sometimes technology is seen as redeeming our lives: nondisabled people believe—and expect us to believe—that technology will "solve" the problem of our disability and save us". Find it in the ETHOS library *~
